ORDINARY HAMS... ORDINARY PATRIOTS... EXTRAORDINARY DUTY...

"The secret of war lies in the communications"

— Napoleon Bonaparte

Phil crouched down on one knee on the steep slope as he hurried to set up his comms. He had to send word back to the makeshift patriot base before it was too late. How would he ever pull off sending the encrypted message in time without getting snagged by the foreign army below him in the ravine? Being one of a two man recon team, he knew that if he didn't, it could mean life or death to his entire group. He had the necessary radio skills to get the word to them, but could he go undetected or would the invaders triangulate on his signal? He dialed it in and said a prayer. How could he ever have guessed he and his recon team mate would be the first Americans to call in the first strike against the invading armies?

Would his highly modified skills be enough to make a difference against this invading world superpower?
